This is a creative interpretation of the The Last Supper, only adorned with the last piece of real steak in the world. Eson has demonstrated another distressing side of food waste in a scientific manner such as sustainable development and GM food. His descriptions of fried insects and rice tablets have already got me savouring every mouthful of food! The story might expand to a page-turner full of creativity and insights into how our course of future is changed with our apathy and ignorance of food waste. Indeed, if more words are allowed, I'm eager to see how Grandpa Max's family responds after hearing the terrible 'history', which is very likely to be our future should we continue to sit on the sidelines.

BRONZE WINNER'S STORY

It was the year 2080. Grandpa Max knew his days were numbered. He decided to have his last meal with his family. It wasn't the usual fried insects, artificial meat or rice tablets, but a piece of steak. As his family was staring at it admiringly, Grandpa Max started telling how this all began.

Decades ago, like many others, he always ordered too much food, and threw the left overs away as they wouldn't be "fresh" later. And one day, there was no more real food.

Grandpa Max passed away that night and so did the last piece of real food.
